runs together with her partner Rien Korteknie an architectural practice in Rotterdam, The Netherlands. The practice uses a simple, natural architectural language developed from a strong concern about the physical, social, natural and cultural context of their projects, and an interest for the spatial and experiential qualities of their buildings.

The practice has been mainly working on small-scale residential projects, experimental pavilions and buildings for culture, education and healthcare. All projects share limited budgets and a resourceful approach to various constraints. To achieve the desired spatial and tactile quality and character the practice has been pioneering with various innovative timber building systems such as CLT and various other sustainable means for prefabrication.
